

Diversity and the Law: Everybody is equal before the law? Some reflections in the Spanish case of comparative perspective

María Luisa Gómez Jiménez

Profesora de la Universidad de Málaga

Departamento de Derecho

Área de Derecho Administrativo

This paper will examine the treatment of the equality principle in the legal body in an international context, as a human right. It will emphasize how public bodies need to integrate the diversity on public policies. The case for the social rights will be examine to determine weather it´s needed a change in the definition of the equal principal when the economic crisis is beating hard. In special the case of housing and discriminatory policies regarding affordability will be taken into account.

The case of study will be the European Law; the fight against discrimination, marginalization. The conclusions will focus then, in determining weather it is needed a new definition of the right to equal treatment and how this should be properly addressed in the post-crisis era.